I am a photographer living in the San Francisco Bay Area and have been creating photographic images for 30 years. I switched from film to digital photography 12 years ago when I realized that it offered a much broader range of techniques for manipulating my images.

My general philosophy in working with the images I capture with my camera is to create a viewing experience that is similar in some way to the experience I had when I was taking the photograph. I identify the aspects of a scene that drew my attention and then adjust the printed image to give those aspects the prominence they had in the original scene.

This image was taken at Pebble Beach, a small State Beach about 20 miles south of Half Moon Bay. I was particularly taken by the reflection of the overcast sky on the wet rocks. Once I found a composition I liked, I exposed for several seconds to capture the flow of foamy seawater through the rocks.

This fountain is located in Keller Fountain Park, a city park near the waterfront in downtown Portland. It is named after Ira Keller, a noted civic leader. It is said that the design for the fountain was inspired by the waterfalls in Columbia River Gorge. The fountain is a large one, with several vertical levels and horizontal divisions and was a joy to explore with my eye and my camera. This particular composition - angled blocks and vertical falls together with the complimentary orange and green stains - I found to be particularly pleasing.
